(c) The Consumer Protection Act, 1986 prescribes a simple procedure for redressal of consumer disputes taking into account the fact that the complainant is an average consumer. Since only the principles of natural justice and summary trials are to be adoped by the consumer fora in disposal of complaints, the complainants is neither required to engage a legal practitioner nor is it obligatory under the Act. However, in order to assist complainants, who are poor, the National Consumer Disputes Redressal Commission (NCDRC) appoints Amicus Curiae, whenever considered necessary.
